Greek to US?:

Lessons America Must Learn from Greece to Avoid Our Own Debt Crisis

Greece's economy hit a tipping point when its government debt reached 137% of GDP. Facing bankruptcy, Greece received a €110 billion ($145 billion) bailout package, contingent on €14.32 billion in spending cuts and €14.09 billion in tax hikes over the next five years, including:

- Cutting national defense by 10%
- Cutting social security spending by about 10%, including raising the retirement age by four years and implementing means testing
- Closing or merging almost 2,000 schools
- Raising property taxes, Value-Added Tax (VAT) rates, and imposing new taxes on everything from income and consumption to property, homes and profitable businesses
- Cutting 30,000 government jobs, slashing government salaries by 15% or more, and reducing pensions for current retirees by 20%, and for future beneficiaries by 40%

The results? Since the onset of the Greek recession:

- Real GDP has fallen nearly 10%
- The unemployment rate has doubled from 8.3% to 16.7%, and the Greek economy employs fewer people today than it did in 2002
- Default of Greek debt remains a real possibility

Similar measures and results in the United States, an economy almost 50 times larger, would mean:

- 14 million fewer jobs (and 25 million unemployed)
- $1 trillion reduction in GDP from 2010
- Raising the retirement age to 71

We still have time to avert disaster through gradual reforms, but we must act soon. Greece once taught us how to create a democracy. Now, we must learn from their mistakes how to save one.
